“You Smell Like a Hippie” Is a Compliment Now

Natural grooming isn't just a granola-dusted niche category anymore. A new breed of greener, cleaner products goes way beyond patchouli.

“Natural” is now “Big Natural.” Conglomerates (like Unilever) are snapping up independent brands (like Schleich's Naturals) by the dozen, and big-box chains like Target are dedicating entire sections to green products. Naturally (sorry, this is great, right? Almost). The dark green underbelly of green grooming is that the consumer has to work even harder to know what's in a bottle. With any booming segment comes misleading marketing—but a “clean” and “nontoxic” category can be especially hard to navigate because what constitutes a natural product is mostly unregulated. Labels come with all kinds of near-meaningless terms, like, you know, “natural.” So to help you through this period of confusion, we not only tested hundreds of items to see if they actually work but rejected anything that doesn't contain a large percentage of naturally derived, plant-based ingredients. Only you know what's legit, you can choose from loads of effective products. Or you can just ditch your current bottles and replace them with our favorites. (Remember to recycle!)—SARAH WANCE
